Effects of central nervous system activity on the urinary sodium excretion in conscious rats. We studied the effect of various levels of central nervous system (CNS) activity on the regulation of the urinary sodium excretion (UNaV) in conscious rats. In the first experiment, we examined the effects of the intravenous administration of pentobarbital (30 mg/kg) on UNaV after a 7-day dietary sodium depletion. In the second experiment, we intravenously administered naloxone (3 mg/kg) or sodium salicylate (300 mg/kg) into pentobarbital-anesthetized rats. In both experiments, saline was injected after the CNS active substances were administered. Sodium retention was observed in both experiments after saline administration, and UNaV was also significantly decreased. In the first experiment, the suppression of UNaV after saline administration was not observed after pentobarbital administration. However, in the second experiment, the suppression of UNaV after saline administration was observed. These results suggest that the suppression of UNaV after saline administration depends on the level of the central nervous system activity in conscious animals. It is presumed that the CNS facilitates the suppression of UNaV by keeping the osmolality and natriuretic activity constant when the level of brain osmolality is increased. Association between use of herbal medicines and all-cause mortality in a cohort of Korean women: The Ansan-Ansung cohort study. The prevalence of use of herbal medicines (HMs) for preventive health management has recently increased. However, the relationship between their use and all-cause mortality is unclear. We evaluated the association between overall use and mortality in the general Korean population. The subjects were 6514 Korean women aged 50-59 years at the baseline survey from the An
